The general maimers of the people, we may reasonably presume, continued to be equally influenced by their favourite pursuits. J The last general feature, which it seems necessary to notice on this occasion, in the ancient manners of the Cambro-Britons, H The allusion to this event occurs in a poem by Iorwerth Self who wrote in the 14th century, the following is the passage: When Maelgwn Iŷir went from the territory of the Son of Don. From the Banquet of the champion of the Congress to Cacr Seion, And was taking with him memorials of the superior excellence That vocal song had acquired over the minstrels. Stc....
