

Migration in Germany - Violent crimes committed by young men of foreign origins

By Sandro Sterneberg

GRIN Verlag. Paperback. Book Condition: New. This item is printed on demand. Paperback. 28 pages. Essay from the year 2008 in the subject Business economics - Miscellaneous, printed single-sided, grade: 1, 3, Berlin School of Economics (Fachbereich 1), course: Political Economy and Social Structures of Modern Societies, language: English, abstract: In the 1960s the Federal Republic of Germany signed contracts with Turkey and other countries to send workers, mostly from rural areas, to support the booming industrial economy (The German Economic Miracle). . . . Nowadays Germany is a country of immigration which faces the challenges but also chances of a multicultural society. Unfortunately many foreign families are dependent on public transfer payments and therefore live in poor social and economical situations. People who are living under difficult conditions with no prospect for a positive change are likely to become criminals. Especially male teenagers and young men with migrant backgrounds (between 14-25 years) are in larger German cities more likely to be intensive culprits and commit crime. Therefore juvenile delinquency is an important issue for Germany which has been discussed in the public dispute for many years. The scandal about the Rtli-Hauptschule in Berlin (2006), where tutors refused to give...
